The Henson House is a wooden house, appearing to be of log construction, three bays in length, two storeys high, fronting southeast, hereinafter called south, with a two storey, two bay frame addition at the east end which nearly coincides, in profile, with the original; another two storey, two bay frame addition, east of the first addition, is slightly smaller in profile, and is of recent vintage. The earliest portion of the house is covered with plain weatherboards; the middle section is covered with German siding and the new section has plain weather boards. A one storey shed roofed porch extends across the principal fronts of the original house and its first addition. The early section has an interior chimney at each gable end.

Windows are 6/6, with louvred blinds. An architrave with an applied cyma backband surrounds each window and the doors, in the center bay of each facade. There are no windows in the center bay at the second storey level. The south door jamb is paneled, with applied Greek revival echinus mouldings defining one tall panel opposite the door, one short one opposite the transom. The transom and transom bar are now missing, with a modern taller door installed, the remaining height being filled with modern plain wood.

On the north facade, at approximately the second floor line, a "pent"-like projection formed of plain wood boards protrudes from the facade of the wall, unexplained by superficial examination.

Inside, most surfaces have been refinished, but the beaded, twoplane architraves with applied cyma backband survive at most exterior openings. The east chimney serves a fireplace in the first floor; the west chimney is a single flue, apparently of modern vintage. The straight stair rises within the middle section, but a winding stair rises to the attic immediately south of the east chimney; a similar stair probably existed at that location from the first floor to the second, now removed.
Some split lathe with cut nails is visible in the stairway. In the top log, or the top wall plate, of the east wall are notches for the former studs closing the gable end, now removed to open the original attic to the attic of the addition.

The stone walled cellar extends under the entire original section. First floor joists are logs, and only the east chimney is framed.

The house measures approximately 18 by 24 feet, the first addition is about 19 feet long.

North of the first addition is a stone meat house, 12 feet square, with a gabled roof.

Fimible, datable elements, such as the trim, lathing, and nails, suggests the 1815-1830 period, but the basic age of the structure is indeterminable by superficial examination.
